Program Spotlight

Radiologic Technology

Radiologic Technologists/Radiographers assist physicians using X-ray to diagnose disease and injury, exercise initiative and independent judgment in performing X-rays, operate X-ray equipment, provide patient care and radiation protection, produce and process radiographs, and maintain quality control.

Graduates are eligible to apply for state and national Radiography certification examinations. With further training and certification, radiographers can work in computed tomography, magnetic resonance imaging, mammography, bone densitometry, cardiac interventional radiography, vascular interventional radiography, nuclear medicine technology, radiation therapy, sonography, and as registered radiologist assistants.

Delgado's Radiologic Technology Program is a 24-month Associate of Applied Science degree program. Graduates are eligible to take state and national board exams.

Salary

People established in their career generally earn between $46,490 and $70,430 per year. Exceptional performers can earn in excess of $82,590, based on data collected from the U.S. Department of Labor.
